Travelling by Train - Where Would You Like to Go?

Train travel is unlike any other way to get from A to B; the journey really does become something to savour and it is not just about reaching a destination. Oftentimes travelling by train feels so different to any other form of travel that when the journey actually ends you can feel a trifle disappointed. Because the UK train network is now connected to that of mainland Europe means that the sort of journeys we can now undertake on a train are limitless. So where would you like to travel by train?

Maybe you fancy a quick trip to Paris? Making this journey today only takes about three hours once the train has been boarded at Waterloo in London. This railway journey involves speeding under the sea on trains that are as comfortable as your own bed. Why go through all the stress related with air travel when you can make this journey in the comfort of a great train? Just thinking about the time it takes to actually get to an airport, as long as all the waiting around involved, making the trip by rail make so much more sense. As well as this, most train stations can be found in easily accessible locations in all major city centres.

This is not to say the rest of Europe doesn't have any nice locations to go to, it's just Paris is an extremely popular destination. And once someone has arrived in Europe, the possibilities are endless when it comes to European rail travel, and it's only your time that will limit where you can go. At the end of the day, you don't even have to make Europe your final destination. You can even travel on to Russia, making use of the Trans-Siberian Express. And how about going further afield by alighting the Orient Express. When it boils down to it, your imagination is the only thing that can hold you back when it comes to rail travel.
